David Hockney A Big Splash
A Bigger Splash is a large pop-art painting by British artist David Hockney.Measuring 242.5 centimetres (95.5 in) by 243.9 centimetres (96.0 in), it depicts a swimming pool beside a modern house, disturbed by a large splash of water created by an unseen figure who has apparently just jumped in from a diving board.It was painted in California between April and June 1967, when Hockney was ...

A Bigger Splash - Wikipedia
Artwork page for "A Bigger Splash", David Hockney, 1967 on display at Tate Britain. The 1960s are often seen as a time when Britain emerged from the 'greyness' of the post-war years into a period of optimism, youthfulness and colour. Few works show this better than Hockney's depictions of Californian swimming pools. These evoke a glamorous and exotic life of sun and leisure.

"A Bigger Splash" is both meandering and forthright. Hockney allowed the British-born, American-trained Hazan remarkable access. At one point the camera joins the artist in the shower.

A Clearer Picture of 'A Bigger Splash' - The New York Times
David Hockney's A Bigger Splash is an invitation to dreamy thoughts of hot Californian days, with sticky air and the coolness of a plunge in the pool. It is understandable that it inspired both Jack Hazan in the 1970s with his documentary biopic of the artist, and more recently Luca Guadagnino who directed A Bigger Splash.Although the latter doesn't have much to do with Hockney's ...
